

Made With Heroes and Dragonslayers In Mind

ADHDers often have a staunch resistance to accepting recent and well-researched findings. Namely that they are,

- brilliant
- essential to the work-place
- and strategically invaluable to teams.

In these pages, you will now learn to dislodge the stake of that resistance (big or small) and discover the full bloom potential ADHD talents.

This book respects your multidimensional learning style. You spacious pages, that I call 'Pause Pages', when the flow of your journey requires something more profound than words.

Simple illustrations are scattered throughout for a quite visual processing. You will be given opportunities to see, live, and sense your powerful qualities in what I call, "the lab". In the lab, you get to experiment developing your unique gifts. Not just read about them.

Does seeing yourself as, brilliant, essential to the work-place, and strategically invaluable to teams, conflict with other messages you've received in the past?

Are those messages wedged in the mosaic of your self-concept?

I get it

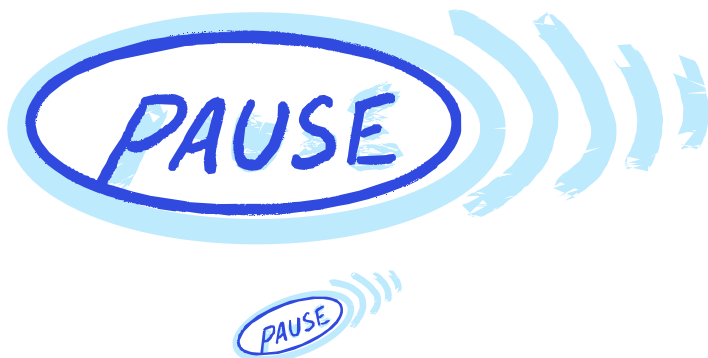

I bet you can even "prove me wrong" with personal anecdotes.

Attempting to be on top of your professional game, you may have already been through a slew of resources that did not help - further enforcing the false story of being less-than.

Not just books. What about all those podcasts, influencers, articles, workshops, and blog posts? Oh yeah. And what about that ten-page over-hyphenated habit-building strategy generated by Chat GPT?"

Before we go any further.

Take a minute to appreciate everything you have done to succeed in a society that doesn't yet appreciate your gifts.

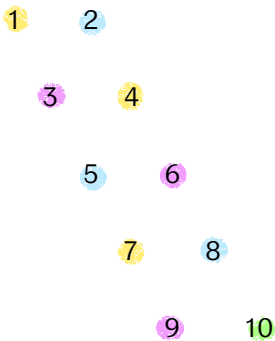

I really mean it. Try putting this book down for a full ten seconds before reading further.

This page is mainly space. It's designed to respect and slow down your natural power of impulsivity.
One of your powers that is currently compelling you to read on .

(I promise the pause is worth your time.)

Looking for something to do
during the 10 secs?
Use your right hand
to rub your left shoulder.

You did it.

You have put so much into your development. Consider the time, the frustrations, the stress, the falls, and the rewards. Oh, that effort. Invisible double-time effort. All that, just to be on par with your colleagues.

Take a deep breath.

A little deeper.

Feel the air fill the bottom of your lungs.

You've probably worked much harder than you give yourself credit for. After all, didn't you just do what anyone must do to make it in this world?

No. You didn't.

"Huh?"

Nope.

You didn't do what anyone must do to make it...

You did much more.

You're a working professional with ADHD. I don't care where you are on the ladder. You darn well on it. How the heck did you do that?

Unless you had an abundance of teachers who could really connect to your learning style, or you were passionately in love with your career path (often the case with actors, artists, and athletes), you fought tooth and nail simply not to drown.

The modus operandi of an ADHD brain does not lend itself well to sequential or tedious tasks. Meds, stress (externally and internally imposed), all-nighters, maladaptive habits, and brute force have been the go-to methods to get things done.

Your bilateral-thinking brain (more on that later) may have also found some brilliant adaptations and ingenious workarounds to accomplish those tasks. Sometimes you aced your exams, or a whole semester. Often, those wins were followed by burnout and months of needed recuperation time.

Does any of this sound familiar?

You may discredit your efforts just like many of your care providers, friends, and mentors often did. They saw your last-minute all-nighters, the need to be comatose for days (or weeks) after a grueling exam, or the avoidance of certain tasks as, well, laziness.

Why wouldn't they think that? For them these avoidant habits can often be turned around with some time management, hard work, and a pep-talk about values and goals. I can practically hear you shunning yourself right now. "Right! I should be able to do that too. The only reason I can't is because I'm lazy!"

I hate to tell ya.

Actually, I love telling you this.

The evidence doesn't support that belief

You are not lazy.

You are extremely motivated.

The work you have put in to getting by, proves it

You see, you haven't been operating on a fair playing field. All the hard work and motivation (that lasts till burn-out) won't help. Not until you learn to change the palying field altogether.

Heresy???

Hearing that you're not lazy might frighten you. If it is going against the messages you've become accustomed to hearing, you're in the right place.

As hard as it might be to hear this, I'm I'm going to hit you with another message. This one is foundational.

Ready?

If you achieved averagely, you're a hero. If you have gone further than that, your a dragonslayer.

Give that a second to sink in.

Let it settle a little more.

You don't have to believe it fully.

Is there a tiny part of you that can accept that statement? Try to tap into just one remaining a shard of hope that was spared even though it endured about 20,000 corrective comments by the time it were ten (in school alone).

Let that part be seen. Shower it with a new awareness.

Whether all this makes sense to you or not, you have just begun a very different kind of journey of achievement that is customized to your greatness. Your productivity is about to flourish. More importantly, your true self is going to shine.

It's time for you to thrive,

not despite your ADHD,

but because of it.
